Respiratory resistance (Rrs) and compliance (Cr_s) have been shown to be increased in children with airways hyperresponsiveness (AHR). The aim of this study was to compare these parameters in a group of children with a clinical suspicion of AHR and in a control group of children with no history of lung disease. Additionally, we investigated whether these parameters could be used as a screening tool to detect AHR in these children. A cross-sectional study was performed in 2 groups of children, 1 group with clinical suspicion of AHR (n = 37) and 1 group with no suspicion of AHR (n = 41). Measurements were made at night in all children. As indicated by the criteria for asthma proposed by the American Thoracic Society, the subjects were divided into 4 groups: group 1 (normal Rrs and Cr_s), group 2 (increased Rrs without increased Cr_s), group 3 (increased Rrs and increased Cr_s), and group 4 (increased Rrs and increased Cr_s, with a peak expiratory flow
