Learn moreQ: How to let the compiler know that a complex structure is initialized/uninitialized?

There's C++ FAQ 3.1.4

: "Many complex structures can be

conveniently written as initialization lists. For example: `struct T { int x; T(int x) : x(x) {} // constructor is not needed }; int main() { T t(10); return 0; }` This compiles fine. For structures that are more complicated (`struct S { int a[100]; }`), an initialiser list is not always the preferred style. If you use an initialiser list, and then forget to initialise the base part of the structure, you could get a run-time error. One of the reasons I want to know is because (as I understand it) a complex struct is "not initialized" if it is not assigned anything. Yet we can't possibly know before

alignment by combining five steps: direction pattern analysis, determination of shift and gap extension, calculation of new shift and gap extension, direction pattern analysis, and lastly comparison of the new shift direction pattern with the initial shift direction pattern. Our objective is to develop a general method that can correct a variety of gene cluster misalignment problems. We used our method to analyze genome-wide human gene clusters and found that multiple gene clusters can be automatically corrected
