CNN Posted: 01/27/2013 02:43:07 PM MST Updated: 01/27/2013 02:45:32 PM MST Intel CEO Paul Otellini is shown in a file photo. Otellini's position and the role of Intel's President at large, S. Max Citron, will be eliminated and replaced by the position of Chief Product Officer, Intel announced Friday, Dec. 21, 2012. (AP Photo/Paul Sakuma) Intel: We don't own DRM There are three layers to an integrated circuit: the silicon, the gates and the wafer. Not all three are necessarily for Intel. When Intel announces on Wednesday that it is turning off support for controversial digital rights management technologies, it won't be talking about the silicon, nor the gates. Only the wafer itself will be affected. Though the publicly traded company is best known for manufacturing processors, it also designs chips. And like other chip makers, it licenses the intellectual property for certain technologies, including its Secure Digital (SD) Media card. With that, Intel is sitting on chips for SD cards that will refuse to communicate with any reader or card with other digital content. It's also making a wafer that does exactly the same thing to any application that relies on a newer standard, USB 2.
