Modification of the 5-HT₃ receptor by the single amino acid substitution Asn1083. Serotonin (5-HT) stimulates granule cell excitation in the cerebellar cortex through a 5-HT₃ receptor-like autoreceptor at a local site of the cell body. In contrast to the 5-HT autoreceptor, the 5-HT₃ receptor mediates outward sodium current when activated by low concentrations of 5-HT. By introduction of this single amino acid substitution Asn1083 Ser, a preferential sodium blocker was created. This substitute receptor has a high binding affinity for [3H]granisetron, a potent and selective 5-HT₃ receptor antagonist, as well as for the anorectic agent, m-chlorophenylbiguanide (mCPBG). The relative 5-HT₁-like potency ratio of the substitute receptor for these agonists was 1.1 (mCPBG) and 1.03 (granisetron). The relative 5-HT₁-like potency of the substitute receptor for 5-HT was reduced to approximately 1/10 of the native receptor. The direction of the shift in the agonist-induced concentration-response curves resulted from a 5-HT₁-like action of the substitute receptor. The 5-HT₃ receptor blocker, ICS 205-930, inhibited the substitution mutant with a potency ratio approximately 3.8:1. The mutant substituted receptor could be functionally reconstituted in both a heterologous expression system and a cerebellar granule cell-enriched culture system. These results show that this substitution mutation is functional and that the mutation causes a reduction of the magnitude of 5-HT₃ receptor mediated 5-HT₁-like action.
